weaver of nightmares!" – Robert R. McCammon author of Usher's Passing and Swan Song.

Piper was about to be evicted from her flat when a solicitor contacted her with what was basically -- a God send. All she had to was pay back taxes on the old family house and it was hers to keep. So she did. But she didn't know about the other occupant that never left, not until it was much too late. Piper Williams is barely keeping her larder stocked, and is way behind on the rent when for the price of the back taxes she can claim a house that has been in her family for generations past. Seeing it as a solution to her financial woes and an opportunity to be left alone to work in peace Piper empties what is left of her bank account and moves in. Yet old places need work and everything is on the fritz. But 'old' doesn't account for the face that sometimes appears in the window. And old doesn't account for that stain that keeps returning on the rug. And 'old' doesn't account for the old armoire that holds an ancient cloak that is only sometimes dry. When events turn hellishly evil and Piper finds herself in the battle of her life, can she find a way to put the house to rest or like all her passed before her, will she be destroyed and bound to the house forever? Zelda's Grandies left her their English country manor. It should have gone to Mother, but Mother would have sold it. Maybe Zelda should have done that too. Zelda was in luck the family manor had been willed to her, and it was perfect for the new drama the Beeb were planning. All she needed to do was to host a party and get a film crew to film the house. The footage would convince the producers her manor was just right. And Zelda really needed the money. The problem was, it was Christmas and the Grands had made it a rule to vacate the manor every year the week before Christmas. Her mother didn't want her to stay there and the estate lawyer had a letter for her from the grave warning her to leave at Yuletide for warmer shores. But the Grands were simply addled, and her mother was superstitious. That's what Zelda thought until unattached alarms started blaring, and locked doors were opened. When a strange leering man appears in her bathroom mirror Zelda begins to get worried, when the decapitated heads of Santa and the Snowman appeared on the end of her bed, Zelda experiences utter terror. And when nothing she does can get rid of the vagrant that seems to be in residence in her house, Zelda has to admit Grandies were right. Can Zelda save herself and her manor, or will she fall
